Since the publication of the reports of passengers and correspondents as to the snowed-up condition of the Union Pacific Railroad, public opinion is more and more loudly expressed in favor of a Southern route to the Pacific coast, runing in a latitude that will be favorable to all-the-year travel and traffic. The New York Tribune, in advance of the Northern press in the expression of favor with which the Memphis and El Paso Railroad is regarded by the Northern people, has generously urged upon the attention of Congress the passage of a bill similar to that of Senator KELLOGG, of Louislana, the provisions of which are favorable for as rapid construction of the work as that which excited the wonder of the world and attracted to the now nearly completed Northern route the attention of both continents. In view of this and the additional fact of the partial report of a majority of the Sanate Committee on Pacific Railroads, made at the close of the last Congress, we have reason to hope that before the additional that the close of the last Congress, we have reason to hope that before the additional time, of removing officials ad libitum, and without a cause.
